A big "Thanks" also goes out to the Habitat for Humanity of Durham for sharing these generous and hard working students with us.

Habitat for Humanity receives high rankings in terms of reputation

In their annual survey of corporate reputations, Harris Interactive and the Reputation Institute found that respondents trust non-profit, philanthropic, and advocacy groups more than for-profit companies, but not by much, the Wall Street Journal reports.

The survey results show that 15 percent of respondents trust the information they receive from non-governmental organizations (NGOs) on such issues as the environment, poverty, and human rights, compared to only 3 percent for for-profit companies. The remaining 82 percent say their level of confidence depends on the issue and the specific group providing the information. The survey, which included nonprofits for the first time, found the trust in NGOs was highest among women and people under forty.

When asked about the credibility of twenty specific nonprofits, respondents gave the highest rankings to Doctors Without Borders and Habitat for Humanity. The Salvation Army and Red Cross came in third and fourth respectively.

Home Repair Tip of the Month

Updating a Bathroom Faucet

There are a wide variety of bathroom vanity faucets on the market. Which one you choose depends on the hole configuration of your sink. Here are some important things to keep in mind –

- A sink with one hole will require a single hole, all-in-one faucet
- Sinks with three holes that are set a standard four inches apart are common. A center-set faucet will work best.
- If the holes are set wide apart, choose a widespread faucet with two handles.
- Vessel sinks can rest above the counter top and may allow for a faucet that mounts to the wall or even the floor.
- If you're also replacing the sink, it's easier to install the faucet before the sink is set into place.
- Plumber's putty forms a good seal between the faucet and the mounting surface.
